WHAT: The Maryland General Assembly passed a bill earlier this year that created a commission to study the death penalty. The commission is charged with examining a number of issues, including disparities in the application of the death penalty, the cost differential between litigating prolonged capital punishment cases and life imprisonment, and the impact of DNA evidence. The commission must submit a final report on its findings and recommendations before the end of the year.

They will hear from a series of experts, but also need to hear from the public.
